Local transportation funding needs being ignored again

May 4, 2016

For more than 70 years, the state of Maryland has shared gas tax revenues and then vehicle registration fees with local governments to provide a predictable revenue stream that helped counties, cities and towns maintain their streets.

When the Great Recession struck less than a decade ago, the state of Maryland cut highway aid to local governments by 96 percent, using the monies to support the state's general fund.

Baltimore City experienced smaller percentage cuts, recognizing the fact that the city maintains roads that the state would normally maintain in other jurisdictions.

In response, local governments across the state cut back on or deferred road maintenance projects and transferred money from other local priority programs.

More municipal governments raised local property tax rates than at any other time according to available historical records. Counties, faced by state mandates to maintain school funding, had limited ability to shift within their own budgets.

While the state has since increased its local transportation funding stream, its commitment to local road maintenance is still dramatically less than it was for the better part of a century.

The Maryland Municipal League and the Maryland Association of Counties have both worked to pass legislation in the Maryland General Assembly that would reinstate over time full road and bridge maintenance funding for the state's local governments.

A bill to begin the process passed the Senate and failed in the House in 2016.

The economy of Maryland has returned to some semblance of normalcy. The state's Rainy Day Fund is robust. The General Assembly was generous this year in providing additional funding to meet the needs of other jurisdictions and interests.

Yet, shared transportation revenues lag badly — with cities at roughly 50 percent of their historic funding levels, and counties at roughly 10 percent. The cumulative loss of local roadway investment is well over $2 billion. Simply put, no other component of the state budget has suffered reductions of this magnitude.

With the recession in the rearview mirror, we ask: When will the state honor its longstanding commitment to local governments and their citizens by enacting legislation to fully fund state transportation aid to counties, cities, and towns?

Spencer R. Schlosnagle, president of the Maryland Municipal League and mayor of the town of Friendsville

John F. Barr, president of the Maryland Association of Counties and Washington County commissioner

Greenbelt CARES

Week Ending May 13

The GAIL Program, in partnership with BabyLove DC, was able to distribute 21,000 diapers for babies and toddlers in Greenbelt in addition to serving over 180 families with 870 family members at the Springhill Lake Elementary School produce distribution.

Liz Park attended the launch of the University of Maryland SUPPORT, ADVOCACY, FREEDOM, AND EMPOWERMENT (SAFE) CENTER for Human Trafficking Survivors. The Center will address the serious issue of human trafficking in Maryland and provide holistic services to help trafficking survivors to heal and reclaim their lives. Located in College Park on Greenbelt Road, the SAFE Center will provide direct services to U.S. and foreign-born adult and child survivors of sex and labor trafficking. The SAFE Center is initially focused on Prince George's and Montgomery counties, with a longer-term focus on Maryland.

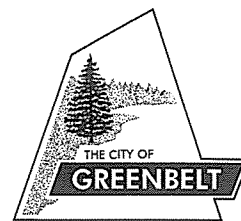

On Wednesday, May 11, the Memory Support Group & Café started their 10 week session the groups will run through July 20.

Darren Stephenson and a graduate student conducted the second session of Active Parenting. Parents learned about styles of parenting, the importance of developing mutual respectful relationships and maintaining effective communication with their teens, and ways to utilize several productive problem-solving methods. Parents were allowed time to share their personal views and experiences on these topics. The next session will be Tuesday, June 7 at 6:45pm.
